Nikon Z7 II Sensor review: Nikon's best mirrorless camera to date

Posted on April 19, 2021 by Kevin Carter
Reading Time: 5 min read

The Z7 II is the first update to the Z7, Nikon's first high-resolution full-frame mirrorless camera launched in 2018. While looking very similar externally to the original Z7, the mark II retains all the headline features such as the 45.7 MP BSI CMOS full-frame sensor, IBIS with 5-axis compensation for Z-series (3-axis for F-mount) lenses, and 3.86 M-dot OLED viewfinder, though of course there have been some new additions. The most far-reaching of these is the inclusion of dual Expeed 6 processors (instead of just one previously), and provision for two memory cards, with the additional slot being SD- (UHS-II) compatible, rather than expanding the use of XQD/CFexpress (Type B) from the original.

Polaroid has launched what it is calling the tiniest member to join the Polaroid family of cameras and also the smallest analog instant camera in the world: the Polaroid Go. Everything about it is smaller, including a miniaturized version of its classic, square format film.
